

Satellite radio is the best thing going over the airways today. I enjoy its diversified programming immensely. If local programmers are so concerned about the competition from satellite radio, maybe they should look inward not outward for help. It seems if I enjoyed local programming, I'd listen to it. Since I now have a better alternative I don't listen to local programming. Local programmers have already lost me as a customer, even though I must pay for the privilege of listening to satellite radio.

Unless I'm not hearing the whole story, I have no idea why government should be involved in deciding this issue of competition. There's a time and a place for governmental intervention, but this to me doesn't seem to be it.
